Also it's fully compatible with all operating systems.^[@CR36],[@CR37]^. In this case, the presence of stress may affect the lateral root growth, a fact that has been previously reported^[@CR37],[@CR38]^. From the results obtained, it is possible to conclude that the joint effects of sand-culture and water stress, besides promoting a greater root growth than in the absence of both, modify the distribution of dry matter and produce a higher root weight than in the absence of stress. This phenomenon was more pronounced at the nodes that showed a greater root growth. In this work, these nodes were those with the highest length at the end of the experiment. At the same time, there was a general reduction in the biomass of the leaves. In this case, this reduction was significant when the plants were grown under water stress. This fact suggests that the plants are being more concentrated in the development of the roots. The increase of the root weight associated with water stress can be explained by the competition for water with other parts of the plant, such as the leaves and stems. However, in the present study, it is possible to observe that water stress inhibits the development of the plant, which suggests that the reduction in the development of the leaves may not be related solely to a limitation of water. This hypothesis is reinforced by the observation that the development of the lateral roots of the plants exposed to the joint effect of sand-culture and water stress tends to have greater weight than in the absence of both factors, which are also associated with a greater development of the lateral roots in the roots of the plants exposed to both water stress and sand-culture. Finally, in the present study, a marked reduction in the growth of plants by sand-culture was observed. This fact was intensified by the stress applied at the beginning of the experiment. In this case, a progressive decrease of the shoot length was observed, which suggests the growth of the roots due to the depletion of the soil moisture and the hydraulic pressure exerted by the roots on the soil.
