Controversial donations to State Department The Obama administration is defending its latest $500,000 donation from two controversial donors, saying that the money is a routine expense from a federal agency. Critics, however, have questioned whether the $500,000 was spent efficiently, making the donations appear out of place. Secretary of State Hillary Clinton met Friday with Foreign Minister John Baird of Canada to discuss the Iran nuclear deal. The U.S. had a $500,000 donation to the Canadian embassy paid in full in 2011. The State Department said Friday that the Department of State Diplomatic Action Fund reimbursed the Canadian Embassy. But some critics are still questioning the nature of the payment. The State Department has also had to explain other seemingly odd expenses, including a $1,000 portrait of the secretary of state given to the U.S. Embassy in Madrid. The donation from Florida International University in Miami to the State Department was given in 2009. A spokesman said the university paid the money itself. Critics also question whether the newly disclosed donation was given to the State Department by the government, or from the university. The New York Times reported that the donation came from the university's non-profit foundation. But an official said the donation was not a tax-ded
