How can I do this? A: You could do this with base R: subset(df, A %in% c(1,2,3)) You can use the indices to find those entries in A that fall into those ranges: subset(df, A %in% c(1,2,3))[c(1,3)] A: Another solution using pmin and pmax. subset(df,A %in% pmin(1:3,A)) # A B C #1 1 a 2 #3 3 b 6 The enemy of the fact is the enemy of the truth. We are living in an increasingly dangerous world. What if the enemy of the fact is not an evil dictator? What if it is a benign dictator? Life in Russia, under Vladimir Putin, is difficult. The corrupt system, in which party interests override those of the individual, is horrendous. But, for the people, it's not all bad. Life is a little better

Even a small flow of water, through the roots, triggers this physiological response: The leaf, when it turns yellow, is the first sign of growing drought. The following days and weeks it dries more and more. The stem has only a few leaves left, the so-called 'stump', the bole is bare. The vine is almost dry. It gives less and less. Its stalk is also dry, but the big leaf, above, is still intact. The big leaf looks like a last bulwark of vegetation – until its turn, too, becomes yellow and dry. The last row of green leaves is the strongest row. It is the only row that moves. The leaves start to turn yellow, drying. They flutter towards the sky. Slowly they fall towards the earth, detaching with their stalk from the vine. They are not yellow or dried out. Their thin leaves are still wet, due to the cloud of fine drizzle around them. The vine, still alive, drops its crown of leaves. There is nothing left. This image is made of two images taken from the same frame: the vine and the single leaf. The latter is enlarged and positioned opposite it, to show the position of the leaf without altering the composition. Photography is a contact medium,
