To our visitors, this is a no-brainer. If you shop often online, then you've noticed that many companies have developed systems to automatically move your debit and credit card info into their databases. If you can create a good online presence, you'll find plenty of ways to cash in on your shoppers' email addresses. (See How to Do a Trade Show Booth Marketing Plan That Works.) And if you place your products in conspicuous areas, you'll often be called on to explain your business to a small percentage of your visitors. Because of these downsides, some shop owners decide to eliminate as much contact as possible between their customers and the places they purchase from. But this is risky, because it can leave your business's reputation hanging in the balance -- or it may even make you look like a scammer. Estee Klein knows all about these risks. She's been a freelancer for almost 17 years, and she's sold her books, music, and DVDs in that time. She also published a small press comic book, which was picked up by DK Publishing, who put together four books of it. Klein's been working with CreateSpace since 2011, and she has many credits to her name: she's written the ebooks "How to Do a Fashion Illustration," "How to Write and Sell Your Ebook
