Download The Art of Operative Dentistry: Basic and Advanced Mode-selective optical noise in the midinfrared. Two optical noise models for broadband nondispersive sources of radiation are considered: Gaussian and 4-f Fourier. (4-F) result in coefficients of proportionality between the noise power and the input drive power that are significantly different for the two models; by contrast, in the Gaussian model these coefficients are virtually identical for the two models. It follows that, for a Gaussian noise source, the Gaussian model has a cutoff frequency that is of the order of the inverse of the square-root of the natural frequency of a mode; this suggests that the cutoff frequency can be made to depend on the intrinsic spatial distribution of noise sources in the optical elements of a resonator. For a uniformly emitting nondispersive source, the cutoff is constant. Finally, it is demonstrated that the 4-f Fourier noise model can be used to predict the behavior of a nondispersive source with spatial modes that are separated by less than the source width.
